There was a strong focus on research from a caring perspective. While important from a "College of Nursing" perspective, there are many areas of clinical research that are vital to the work that is done in nursing. This is especially true for those of us who are nurse practitioners. I would have appreciated the ability to enhance the clinical practice of nurse practitioners with expanded research that applied to how NPs do their work...not the clinical efficacy of a particular treatment (that's medical research) but how we could improve the way we interact with clients to support the improvement in their health outcomes.

Actively engage multiple healthcare disciplines in the learning process. The College of Medicine, the Colleges of Social Work, Music, Business, and Political Science etc. Studying nursing in isolation is not reflective of nor advancing nursing practice. Nursing needs to model contributions to the other disciplines and collaborate with the other disciplines in order to transform healthcare and achieve the best possible patient outcomes.
